Daniel Harris helps define the
*CPA Firm of Tomorrow

CHICAGO, IL – The future of small business will no longer be business as usual! In fact, some experts might predict that it will be business as unusual, if Dan Harris and a key group of business executives have their way in Dallas this week.

Small businesses will be paperless and wireless, employees will be more productive and work in completely different ways, information will be in real-time but companies will not have to drown in information and the latest technologies will make organizations less vulnerable to theft and computer viruses in the future, states Daniel H. Harris, founder and principal en-terpretor of Chicago-based en-terpret.co, an internationally recognized information and management consulting firm.

Harris will co-chair a major professional conference exploring how emerging technologies are reshaping the accounting industry. The conference, called The CPA Firm of Tomorrow, is scheduled for September 23-25 in Dallas. Participants will discuss how to improve workflow, business processes, record keeping and client service by adopting and adapting new systems and practices.

The conference is sponsored by JHI, one of the world's leading professional services organization for accounting and management consulting firms, and open to members of the organization's IT Special Interest Group. Harris, a frequent speaker and presenter at JHI conferences world wide, founded and helps lead the JHI IT Special Interest Group, which focuses on technology issues.

“This is a time of great change but also great opportunity for all accounting professionals, especially in small and medium-sized firms,” Harris says. “Many accounting firms and technology leaders are already paperless and somewhat automated, but tomorrow’s firm will be both. There is a tremendous opportunity for these leaders to learn how they want to leverage technology and make their clients more effective in the future. As advisors to small to medium sized companies, these advisors will share best practices, discuss ways to leverage their client’s business in the future and ultimately decide how they want to lead by example,” Harris further commented.

Topics to be addressed at the conference include Emerging Technologies and Their Impact on CPA Firms; A New Way to Work: Workflow, Business Process Improvement and How to Work with Digital Documents; and Document Management, Client Portals / Extranets and Intranets. Harris will lead sessions on working with Vista, Microsoft’s new operating system and encryption systems to improve information security.

Harris is an energetic speaker and tireless advocate for bringing people and technology together, solving the problems that all business people face in the Information Age. He is available for presentations to local Chambers of Commerce and other groups on a variety of topics, including Information Security, Internet Security, Disaster Recovery Planning, Remote Access Implementation, Laptop Security, Outsourced IT Management, Improving Quality, Home Systems / Office Systems Consulting, Online Backup Systems, Enhancing Customer Outreach and Rethinking Technology as an Enabler, Not a Cost Center.

Harris has been on the speaking circuit this year making presentations in Shanghai, Zurich, Rome, San Diego and Chicago.
